Help for Picky Eaters

Mealtime with a picky eater is stressful – for parent and child.

Studies show that:

- Many parents think their child is a picky eater. In fact, their child's eating behavior is probably normal.
- Kids can learn to eat new food. However, many kids need to be exposed to the food – often.
- One in five pre-schoolers is a picky eater. If your child is a picky eater, you are not alone.
- One to two percent of kids will need professional help.
- Forbidding a certain food – like candy – often makes a child want that food more.
- A 2 – 3 year old child's food likes and dislikes are often related to what his mom likes and dislikes. It is also related to food a child never tastes because mom never serves it.
- Many children outgrow picky eating at about age 4 – 5.

It is normal for a 2 – 5 year old child to refuse to eat certain foods. Toddlers often fear what is new. This includes food.

Tips for parents of picky eaters:

Do:

- Eat meals at the same time every day. Eat at a table with other family members.
- Stay calm during meal times. Meals should be fun and stress free.
- Allow your child to touch and smell her food.

- Offer new foods often. Start with small bites – a tablespoon full. It may take as many as 10 attempts before your child will try something new. Do not give up.
- Serve familiar foods when you offer a new food. Your child will feel less pressure. Offer the new food first, then the familiar foods.
- Make meals fun. Use cookie cutters for fun shapes. Offer dips with fruit and veggies.

Do not:

- Allow snacks for 1 – 1 ½ hours before a meal. You want your child to be hungry at meal time.
- Force your child to eat. Kids generally eat when they are hungry.
- Cook different meals for each child. Serve one family meal.
- Use dessert as a reward. It should be special for all. Instead, offer desserts for everyone two days a week.

Talk to your doctor if you are worried about your child's eating patterns.
